

A GUIDE TO CONFIDENCE, SELF-WORTH & LASTING FULFILLMENT

THE ART OF LOVING YOURSELF

How High-Achieving
Women Reclaim
Their Energy,
Confidence, and Joy
Without Sacrificing Success

[SSIREESHA PUDURU]

Copyright

The Art of Loving Yourself

Copyright © 2026 by Ssireesha Puduru

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, stored in a retrieval system, or translated into any language, in any form or by any means—electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise—without the prior written permission of the author, except for brief quotations used in reviews or scholarly works.

This book is intended to inspire personal growth and self-reflection. It is not a substitute for professional medical, psychological, legal, or financial advice. Readers are encouraged to seek qualified professional guidance where appropriate.

The stories shared throughout this book are based on real-life experiences. In some instances, names, identifying details, and circumstances have been changed to protect the privacy of individuals.

The Art of Loving Method™ is the intellectual property of Ssireesha Puduru. No part of this framework may be reproduced, taught, or distributed without written permission.

First Edition

Cover Design: Ssireesha

Published independently by:

Ssireesha Puduru

Website: www.sireeshapuduru.com

Dedication

To every woman who has spent her life taking care of everyone else...

May this book remind you that you, too, deserve your own love.

Table Of Contents

Introduction

The Success Paradox

How to Read This Book

Part I — Awareness

Chapter 1

The Hidden Cost of Success

Chapter 2

Burnout Is Not a Badge of Honor

Chapter 3

Why Success Doesn't Silence Self-Doubt

Chapter 4

The Perfectionism Trap

Chapter 5

The People-Pleasing Trap

Part II — Acceptance

Chapter 6

Meeting the Woman Beneath the Roles

Part III — Healing

Chapter 7

Healing the Invisible Wounds

Chapter 8

The One Relationship You Never Learned to Build

Chapter 9

The Journey Home

The Art of Loving Method™

Part IV — Love

Chapter 10

Coming Home to Yourself

The Art of Loving Philosophy

A Letter to the Woman Reading This

My Story

The Journey Back to Myself

Before We Say Goodbye...

Introduction

The Success Paradox

On the outside, your life looks successful.

You've worked hard to build a career, support your family, achieve your goals, and become someone others admire. People see you as capable, strong, and dependable.

Yet there may be another side to your story.

The one very few people see.

The side that feels tired.

The side that quietly wonders why, despite achieving so much, happiness still feels just out of reach.

If you've ever found yourself thinking,

"Why do I still feel like I'm not enough?"

"Why am I so exhausted all the time?"

"Why do I keep putting everyone else before myself?"

...then this book is for you.

Over the years, I've had the privilege of working with hundreds of women who, from the outside, seemed to have everything.

Successful careers. Financial independence. Loving families.

Respected positions.

Yet beneath those achievements, many carried the same invisible burdens—burnout, self-doubt, people-pleasing, perfectionism, guilt, and a constant need to prove themselves.

What surprised me most was this:

These women didn't need more success.

They needed a different relationship with themselves.

That realization changed the way I understood personal growth.

I came to see that many of the struggles women face are not because they are weak or incapable.

They simply come from years of putting themselves last.

Years of believing that their worth depends on how much they achieve, how much they give, or how well they meet everyone else's expectations.

But what if there was another way?

What if success didn't have to come at the cost of your peace?

What if you could care for others without abandoning yourself?

What if loving yourself wasn't selfish—but essential?

This book is an invitation to explore those questions.

Not with judgment.

But with curiosity and compassion.

You don't need to become someone different.

You don't need to prove that you're worthy.

You simply need to reconnect with the woman you've always been beneath the expectations, responsibilities, and conditioning.

My hope is that as you turn these pages, you'll begin to see yourself with gentler eyes.

And perhaps, for the first time in a long time...

You'll start coming home to yourself.

How to Read This Book

Before you begin, I'd like to ask you for one small favour.

Don't rush.

This isn't a book to finish as quickly as possible.

It's a book to experience.

Some chapters may make you smile.

Some may make you uncomfortable.

Some may bring back memories you haven't thought about in years.

If they do, be gentle with yourself.

There is no need to judge what comes up.

Simply notice it.

Awareness is always the first step toward healing.

You may find yourself recognising old patterns, beliefs, or emotions. Rather than asking, "What's wrong with me?" I invite you to ask a different question:

"What is this trying to show me?"

You'll also notice a section at the end of each chapter called A Moment With Yourself.

These are not tests, and there are no right or wrong answers.

They are simply invitations to pause, reflect, and listen to yourself.

You don't need to answer every question immediately.

Sometimes the most meaningful insights arrive long after you've turned the page.

Most importantly, remember this:

You don't have to agree with everything you read.

Take what resonates.

Leave what doesn't.

Trust your own wisdom.

This book isn't here to tell you who you should become.

It's here to help you remember who you already are.

So take a deep breath.

Turn the page.

And let's begin this journey—one loving step at a time.

Everything you have been searching for... has been waiting within you...

Chapter 1

The Success Paradox

"Success means very little if, in the process of achieving it, you lose the relationship you have with yourself."

She looked like a woman who had everything.

A successful career.

Financial independence.

A respected position.

A beautiful family.

The kind of life many people aspire to build.

Yet as she sat across from me, she quietly asked,

"Why don't I feel happy?"

That question has stayed with me over the years because I've heard it in different forms from so many accomplished women.

"I've achieved everything I wanted... So why do I still feel empty?"

"Why do I constantly feel like I have to prove myself?"

"Why am I so exhausted?"

From the outside, these women appear confident and successful.

On the inside, many are carrying a very different story.

Perhaps you know that feeling.

Perhaps your life looks successful on paper, yet somewhere deep inside, something feels missing.

Not because you've failed.

But because you've spent so much of your life building a successful career that you've forgotten to build a relationship with yourself.

For many years, I believed success was the answer too.

Like many women, I thought that if I worked hard enough, achieved enough, and became successful enough, I would finally feel worthy.

Surely then, I would feel confident.

Surely then, I would feel at peace.

But life has a gentle way of showing us the difference between achievement and fulfillment.

One thing I've noticed after working with hundreds of women is this:

Success often solves practical problems.

It gives us opportunities.

Freedom.

Financial security.

A sense of accomplishment.

But success cannot heal the quiet belief that says,

"I'm not enough."

It cannot replace self-acceptance.

It cannot give us permission to rest.

And it cannot teach us how to love ourselves.

So many women continue climbing the next mountain, believing happiness is waiting at the top.

But each time they arrive, another mountain appears.

They're hoping achievement will finally give them what only self-love can.

Can I share something I've learned?

Many of the women I meet don't actually need more success.

They've already proved they are capable.

What they need is permission to stop proving.

To stop measuring their worth by how much they achieve.

To stop believing they must earn the love and acceptance they've been seeking all along.

This book was born from that realization.

Not because I wanted to teach women how to love themselves.

But because I wanted to help them remember something they may have forgotten.

That beneath every achievement...

Every title...

Every responsibility...

Every expectation...

There is a woman who is already worthy.

She doesn't become worthy when she succeeds.

She already is.

Everything you are about to read is an invitation.

Not to become someone different.

But to reconnect with the woman you've always been beneath the expectations, responsibilities, and constant striving.

Because I've come to believe that the greatest success in life isn't measured by what you've achieved.

It's measured by the relationship you have with yourself.

And that relationship changes everything.

The greatest cost of success is not the hours you work.

It's the parts of yourself you leave behind while trying to achieve it.

A Moment With Yourself

Before you continue, pause for a moment.

Ask yourself:

- Have I been building a successful life while neglecting the relationship I have with myself?
- If success were no longer how I measured my worth, what would success mean to me?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 2

Burnout Is Not a Badge of Honor

"Burnout doesn't happen because you care too much. It happens because you've forgotten to include yourself in your own care."

"What do you need?"

It seemed like a simple question.

She looked at me.

Then looked away.

For almost a minute, she said nothing.

Finally, she smiled awkwardly and replied,

"I don't know."

That silence told me everything.

Here was a woman who knew exactly what everyone else needed.

She knew her team's deadlines.

Her children's schedules.

Her husband's preferences.

Her parents' medical appointments.

She remembered birthdays, meetings, grocery lists, school projects, and family commitments.

But when I asked what she needed...

She had no answer.

Over the years, I've realised this is one of the quietest signs of burnout.

Not exhaustion.

Not stress.

Not even feeling overwhelmed.

It's forgetting yourself.

When women come to me feeling burnt out, they often believe they have a time-management problem.

"I just need to organise myself better."

"I need to become more productive."

"I need to manage my time."

But very rarely is time the real problem.

The real question is this:

Where did you disappear from your own life?

Can I share something I've noticed?

Most women don't burn out because they have too much to do.

They burn out because they believe they have to do it all.

Somewhere along the way, many of us learned that being a "good woman" meant saying yes.

Yes to helping.

Yes to adjusting.

Yes to sacrificing.

Yes to carrying more than we comfortably could.

And every time we ignored our own needs, it felt like the right thing to do.

Until one day, it didn't.

Burnout doesn't happen overnight.

It arrives quietly.

It begins with saying,

"I'll rest later."

Then,

"I'll take care of myself after this project."

Then,

"Once the children are older..."

"Once things settle down..."

"Once everyone else is okay..."

But "later" keeps moving.

And slowly, without realising it, we stop living our lives.

We simply manage them.

One thing I've learned is this:

Your body is always speaking to you.

The question is whether you're listening.

Long before burnout becomes obvious, the body talks to you.

It talks through tiredness.

Through headaches.

Through back pain.

Through anxiety.

Through interrupted sleep.

Through a loss of joy.

These aren't always signs that something is wrong with you.

Sometimes they're signs that something important has been missing.

You.

One belief I've heard repeatedly is,

"If I rest, I'm being lazy."

Or,

"If I say no, people will think I'm selfish."

It's amazing how many accomplished women carry these beliefs without ever questioning them.

Who decided that rest had to be earned?

Who decided that caring for yourself was selfish?

And why have so many of us accepted those ideas as truth?

Here's something worth remembering:

Rest isn't a reward for working hard.

It's part of being human.

The same is true for asking for help.

Setting boundaries.

Taking a break.

Making time for yourself.

These aren't acts of selfishness.

They're acts of self-respect.

I've noticed something beautiful when women begin to honour their own needs.

They don't become less caring.

They become more present.

More patient.

More joyful.

More themselves.

Because when your own cup is full, you no longer give from obligation.

You give from abundance.

That changes everything.

Burnout isn't asking you to become stronger.

It's asking you to become kinder to yourself.

To stop wearing exhaustion like a medal of honour.

To stop believing that your worth is measured by how much you can carry.

Because you were never meant to carry the weight of the world.

Not even for the people you love.

You are allowed to rest.

You are allowed to receive.

You are allowed to take care of yourself without apologising for it.

Because the woman who takes care of herself doesn't love others less.

She simply stops leaving herself out of the circle of care.

Burnout isn't your body giving up.

It's your body asking you to come back to yourself.

A Moment With Yourself

Before you continue, pause for a moment.

Ask yourself:

- Where in my life have I been putting myself last for so long that it has become normal?
- What is one small way I can include myself in my own care this week?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 3

Why Success Doesn't Silence Self-Doubt

"No amount of achievement can quiet the voice that believes it isn't enough. Only self-acceptance can."

There is something I've observed over the years that never ceases to amaze me.

Some of the most confident-looking women I've ever met are carrying the deepest self-doubt.

You'd never know it by looking at them.

They walk into meetings with confidence.

They lead teams.

They make difficult decisions.

They inspire others.

From the outside, they seem to have it all together.

But when no one's around, a different story begins to emerge.

"I don't think I'm good enough."

"I'm afraid people will realise I don't know what I'm doing."

"I always feel like I have to prove myself."

The first few times I heard these words, I was surprised.

How could women who had achieved so much still question themselves?

Shouldn't success bring confidence?

Over time, I realised

Success can change your circumstances.

But it doesn't automatically change the way you see yourself.

If you've spent years believing that your worth depends on what you achieve, every success feels temporary.

The promotion feels good... until you have to prove yourself again.

The recognition feels wonderful... until someone else does better.

The praise lasts for a moment... and then you're chasing the next achievement.

It's an exhausting way to live.

But you know what?

Many high-achieving women are not driven by success alone.

They're driven by the hope that one day, success will finally make them feel enough.

But "enough" is a moving target.

The more you achieve, the more you believe you have to maintain.

Instead of feeling free, you feel pressure.

Pressure to keep performing.

Pressure to keep succeeding.

Pressure to never let anyone see your doubts.

I've met women who could confidently present to a room full of executives but struggled to ask for help when they needed it.

Because somewhere inside, they believed asking for help meant they were weak.

So they carried everything alone.

One thing I can say..

Confidence isn't the absence of self-doubt.

It's the willingness to stop letting self-doubt define you.

That shift changes everything.

Because instead of asking,

"How do I become more confident?"

You begin asking,

"Why have I been doubting myself in the first place?"

Those are very different questions.

The first looks for another achievement.

The second looks for understanding.

And understanding always leads us inward.

I've often said that women don't struggle because they lack ability.

They struggle because they keep looking outside themselves for proof that they are worthy.

Approval from family.

Recognition at work.

Praise from a partner.

Validation from others.

For a while, those things feel wonderful.

We all appreciate being seen and appreciated.

But they were never meant to become the foundation of our self-worth.

Because external validation is like borrowing confidence.

It feels good while it's there.

But the moment it disappears, so does the feeling.

Real confidence is different.

It isn't loud or about proving anything.

It's the quiet knowing that says,

"I am enough, even while I'm still growing."

That kind of confidence doesn't come from a promotion.

It comes from self-acceptance.

It grows every time you stop comparing yourself to someone else.

Every time you stop apologising for who you are.

Every time you choose to believe that your worth isn't something you have to earn.

Perhaps that's the greatest shift of all.

Moving from asking,

"How can I prove myself?"

to asking,

"What if I don't need to?"

That question has changed the lives of many women I've worked with.

And it might just change yours too.

The moment you stop chasing validation is the moment you begin discovering your true worth.

A Moment With Yourself

Before you continue, pause for a moment.

Ask yourself:

- Where in my life am I still looking for someone else's approval to feel good enough?
- What would change if I truly believed that my worth didn't have to be earned?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 4

The Perfectionism Trap

"Perfection isn't the price of love. It's often the fear of losing it."

"I'll do it once I know it's perfect."

Have you ever caught yourself saying something like that?.

Perhaps it sounded more like,

"I'm not ready yet."

"Let me improve it a little more."

"I'll wait until I feel more confident."

At first, those thoughts seem harmless.

Responsible, even.

After all, what's wrong with wanting to do your best?

Nothing.

Excellence is a beautiful quality.

Perfectionism is something else entirely.

The women I work with are often incredibly capable.

They prepare thoroughly.

They work hard.

They care deeply about what they do.

But many of them also carry an invisible burden.

No matter how well they perform, it never feels good enough.

They complete a project...

...and immediately think about what they could have done better.

They receive praise...

...and dismiss it.

They achieve one goal...

...only to move the finish line a little further away.

It becomes exhausting.

What surprises me is that perfectionism rarely has anything to do with high standards.

It has everything to do with fear.

The fear of making a mistake.

The fear of disappointing someone.

The fear of being judged.

The fear of not being enough.

When you begin looking at perfectionism through that lens, everything starts making sense.

It's no longer about getting things right.

It's about trying not to get them wrong.

And there's a big difference.

Think about how much energy that takes.

Rewriting the same email five times.

Overthinking a simple decision.

Delaying a dream because you don't feel "ready."

Trying to control every outcome.

Trying to be the perfect employee.

The perfect mother.

The perfect partner.

The perfect daughter.

It's impossible.

And yet so many women spend years trying.

Not because they enjoy it.

Because somewhere inside, they've come to believe that mistakes make them less worthy.

I've often wondered what life would feel like if we stopped seeing mistakes as evidence of failure.

What if they were simply evidence that we're human?

That one shift changes everything.

Because suddenly, you don't have to carry the impossible burden of getting everything right.

You only have to show up honestly.

The irony is that perfectionism doesn't protect us.

It limits us.

It keeps brilliant ideas hidden.

It delays meaningful conversations.

It stops women from applying for opportunities they're more than qualified for.

Because they lack permission to be imperfect.

I've seen women wait years before starting something they deeply wanted to do..

Because they believed they had to become perfect first.

The truth is...

Life doesn't respond to perfection.

It responds to courage.

Courage to begin before you feel ready.

Courage to make mistakes.

Courage to grow in public.

Courage to learn.

Perhaps that's what freedom really looks like.

Not living without mistakes.

But living without letting mistakes define you.

The day you stop trying to prove that you're perfect...

...you create space to become authentic.

And authenticity is far more beautiful than perfection will ever be.

Perfection isn't excellence.

It's often fear dressed in beautiful clothes.

A Moment With Yourself

Before you move on, pause for a moment.

Ask yourself:

- Where in my life have I been waiting for perfection before allowing myself to begin?
- What would I do differently if I believed I didn't have to get it right the first time?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 5

The People-Pleasing Trap

"Every time you choose someone else's approval over your own truth, you lose a little of your own voice."

I don't think anyone grows up wanting to become a people pleaser.

It happens quietly.

One small compromise at a time.

You don't express an opinion because you don't want to upset someone.

You say "yes" even though you're exhausted.

You smile when you're hurt.

You stay silent because keeping the peace feels easier than speaking your truth.

At first, these moments seem insignificant.

But over time, they begin to decide the way you live.

And before you know it, you've become so good at listening to everyone else's needs that you've stopped listening to your own.

One of the women I worked with once said something that stayed with me.

"I don't even know what I want anymore because I'm always thinking about what everyone else needs."

I remember sitting quietly for a moment after she said it.

Because I realised how many women feel exactly the same way.

Perhaps you do too.

People often mistake people pleasing for kindness.

But they're not the same thing.

Kindness comes from love.

People pleasing comes from fear.

Fear of disappointing someone.

Fear of being judged.

Fear of creating conflict.

Fear of not being liked.

And when fear is making our decisions, we slowly lose sight of ourselves.

What surprises me is that many women don't even realise they're doing it.

They believe they're simply being caring.

Helpful.

Responsible.

They've spent so many years putting others first that self-neglect feels normal.

I've often asked women,

"When was the last time you said no without feeling guilty?"

The answer is usually followed by laughter.

Because they honestly can't remember.

Somewhere along the way, many of us learned that saying no meant being selfish.

So we kept saying yes.

Yes to more work.

Yes to more responsibilities.

Yes to one more favour.

Yes to one more sacrifice.

Until there was very little of us left..

Every time you say yes to something that goes against your own needs...

you're quietly saying no to yourself.

No to your rest.

No to your peace.

No to your wellbeing.

No to your voice.

And eventually, those quiet no's begin to feel like your normal life.

But here's the beautiful truth.

You don't have to stop being kind in order to stop people pleasing.

You simply have to stop believing that your kindness requires your self-sacrifice.

Healthy relationships make space for two people.

Not one.

The people who truly love you don't benefit from a version of you that's constantly exhausted, overwhelmed and silently resentful.

They benefit from the real you.

A woman who can love deeply...

...without losing herself.

Learning to say no isn't about pushing people away.

It's about making room for yourself.

Sometimes no is the most loving answer you can give.

Not only to yourself...

But also to the people around you.

Because every honest no creates the possibility of a more honest yes.

Perhaps that's what boundaries really are.

Just gentle reminders that your needs matter too.

You don't have to earn the right to take care of yourself.

You already have it.

The goal isn't to become less caring.

The goal is to stop caring for everyone except yourself.

A Moment With Yourself

Take a quiet moment and ask yourself:

- Where have I been choosing harmony over honesty?
- What is one situation where I can lovingly honour my own needs instead of automatically saying yes?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 6

Meeting the Woman Beneath the Roles

"Beneath every role you play lives a woman who simply wants permission to be herself."

Who are you...

...when no one needs anything from you?

Not your children.

Not your partner.

Not your parents.

Not your colleagues.

Not your clients.

Just you.

It's a simple question.

And yet, over the years, I've noticed that it's one of the hardest questions for women to answer.

We're quick to describe what we do.

"I'm a mother."

"I'm a leader."

"I'm a wife."

"I'm a business owner."

"I'm a daughter."

But those are roles.

They tell me what you do.

They don't tell me who you are.

Somewhere between meeting expectations and fulfilling responsibilities, many women slowly lose touch with themselves.

Not because they choose to.

Because life gets busy.

There are careers to build.

Families to care for.

Deadlines to meet.

People to support.

And little by little, your own needs move quietly to the bottom of the list.

Until one day, someone asks,

"What brings you joy?"

And you genuinely don't know.

Because you've been so busy taking care of everyone else that you've stopped listening to yourself.

What surprises me is how often women feel guilty for even asking that question.

Almost as if wanting something for themselves is selfish.

But it isn't.

It's human.

I've met women who could tell me everyone's favourite meal.

Everyone's schedule.

Everyone's dreams.

But when I asked,

"What do you dream about?"

They became silent.

That silence has stayed with me.

Because it reminded me how easy it is to become everything for everyone...

...and nothing for yourself.

Perhaps you've experienced that too.

Perhaps you've become so good at being dependable that you've forgotten what it feels like to simply be.

Not productive.

Not responsible.

Not needed.

Just present.

Here's something I've come to believe.

You are not here only to fulfil roles.

You are here to experience life.

To laugh.

To rest.

To create.

To grow.

To love.

To be fully yourself.

The beautiful thing is that the woman you've been searching for hasn't disappeared.

She isn't lost.

She's simply been waiting patiently beneath all the expectations you've carried.

She still smiles at the things that once brought her joy.

She still dreams.

She still longs to be seen.

Not for what she does.

But for who she is.

Meeting her again doesn't require a dramatic life change.

It begins with something much simpler.

Listening.

Listening to your body when it's tired.

Listening to your heart when it's asking for something different.

Listening to your own voice instead of everyone else's expectations.

Little by little, you begin making choices that honour who you are.

Not because you're becoming selfish.

Because you're becoming authentic.

And something beautiful happens.

The more you reconnect with yourself...

...the more peaceful your relationships become.

Everyone around you may not change.

But you do.

You stop asking people to tell you who you are.

You already know.

That's what coming home really means.

Not finding a new version of yourself.

Simply remembering the one who has been there all along.

You don't lose yourself all at once.

You lose yourself one forgotten dream, one silent sacrifice, and one neglected need at a time.

And you find yourself the very same way.

One loving choice at a time.

A Moment With Yourself

Pause for a few moments and ask yourself:

- If every role I play disappeared tomorrow, who would I still be?
- What part of myself have I been quietly missing?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 7

Healing The Invisible Wounds.

"Children don't experience life as facts. They experience it as meaning. And sometimes, the meaning stays with us long after childhood has passed."

Have you ever stopped and wondered,

"Why do I react so strongly to certain situations?"

Why does one person's criticism stay with you for days?

Why does being ignored hurt more than it seems it should?

Why do some compliments never quite feel believable?

Most of us think we're responding to what's happening today.

But often...

We're responding to a story we've been carrying for years.

Not a story we consciously chose.

A story we quietly believed.

One of the most important things I've learned through my own journey is this:

Children don't just experience life.

They interpret it.

Imagine two children hearing the exact same words.

"You can do better."

One child hears encouragement.

The other hears,

"I'm not good enough."

The words are the same.

The meaning is different.

And it's often the meaning that stays with us.

As children, we don't have the wisdom to question our conclusions.

If we aren't chosen, we may believe,

"I'm not important."

If we're constantly compared, we may believe,

"I'll never be enough."

If we're praised only when we achieve, we may begin to believe,

"I have to earn love."

Those beliefs become quiet stories.

Stories about who we are.

Stories about what we deserve.

Stories about what we can expect from life.

Years pass.

We grow up.

We become educated.

Successful.

Independent.

But those stories don't automatically disappear.

Instead, they quietly influence the choices we make.

The relationships we attract.

The way we speak to ourselves.

The dreams we pursue—or don't pursue.

I've often said that we don't live our lives from what happened to us.

We live our lives from what we believe about what happened to us.

That distinction changed my life.

Because if a belief was created...

It can also be changed.

And that's where healing begins.

Not by changing the past.

But by changing the meaning we've carried from it.

I want to be very clear about something.

This isn't about blaming our parents.

Most parents loved us deeply and did the very best they could with the awareness they had.

This isn't about finding fault.

It's about finding understanding.

When we understand where our beliefs came from, we stop judging ourselves for having them.

Instead of asking,

"What's wrong with me?"

We begin asking,

"What have I been believing all these years?"

That single question opens the door to healing.

Because once we see a belief, we no longer have to live by it.

We can thank it for the role it once played...

...and gently let it go.

I've watched women transform when they realise they are not their stories.

They are the authors of the next chapter.

Perhaps that's the greatest gift of awareness.

It reminds us that while we cannot rewrite the beginning of our story...

We always have the power to choose how it continues.

Your past may explain you.

It does not define you.

The story you've been living isn't necessarily the story you have to keep telling.

A Moment With Yourself

Pause for a few moments and ask yourself:

- What is one belief about myself that I've accepted as truth without ever questioning it?
- If I were writing the next chapter of my life today, what new story would I choose to believe?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 8

The One Relationship You Never Learned to Build

"The relationship that changes everything is the one you build with yourself."

Where do you go when life becomes difficult?

It's a question I've asked many women over the years.

Some throw themselves into work.

Some stay busy taking care of everyone else.

Some distract themselves with endless scrolling, shopping, food, or television.

Others simply keep going, pretending they're fine.

Very few answer,

"I come back to myself."

Most of us have learned how to seek comfort everywhere except within.

We've been taught how to care for others.

How to solve problems.

How to achieve goals.

But very few of us were taught how to sit with ourselves when life feels hard.

Perhaps that's why the words self-love can feel so unfamiliar.

Or even uncomfortable.

Some women hear the words and immediately think,

"Isn't that selfish?"

Others imagine it's about putting themselves above everyone else.

But that's never what self-love has meant to me.

For me, self-love is much quieter.

It's the way you speak to yourself after you've made a mistake.

It's the kindness you offer yourself on a difficult day.

It's allowing yourself to rest without feeling guilty.

It's choosing not to abandon yourself when life becomes challenging.

In other words...

It's becoming your own safe place.

I've often noticed something interesting.

Women who are incredibly compassionate towards others are often the hardest on themselves.

A friend makes a mistake?

They respond with understanding.

Their child is struggling?

They respond with patience.

But when they make a mistake...

The voice changes.

"I should have known better."

"I'm so disappointed in myself."

"Why can't I get anything right?"

Sometimes I ask them a simple question.

"Would you speak to someone you love the way you speak to yourself?"

The answer is almost always the same.

"No."

That answer tells us everything.

The relationship we have with ourselves usually decides every other relationship in our lives.

If we're constantly criticising ourselves...

We'll struggle to believe compliments.

If we're constantly doubting ourselves...

We'll look for reassurance everywhere else.

If we're constantly rejecting ourselves...

We'll keep searching for acceptance from people who can never truly give us what we're withholding from ourselves.

Perhaps that's why self-love feels so transformational.

Not because life suddenly changes.

But because the place you return to changes.

You.

The truth is, life will still have difficult moments.

There will still be disappointment.

Loss.

Failure.

Unexpected challenges.

Self-love doesn't protect us from those experiences.

It simply changes how we walk through them.

Instead of asking,

"Why is this happening to me?"

We begin asking,

"How can I be here for myself while I move through this?"

That single shift changes everything.

Because for the first time...

You stop waiting for someone else to rescue you.

You become the person you've been waiting for.

And perhaps that's what love has always been.

Not finding someone who completes you.

But becoming someone who never abandons herself.

The greatest gift you can give yourself is becoming the place where your own heart feels safe.

A Moment With Yourself

Take a quiet moment and ask yourself:

- When life becomes difficult, where do I usually look for comfort?
- What would it mean for me to become my own safest place?

With love, always begin with yourself.

Chapter 9

The Journey Home

"Healing doesn't change who you are. It gently removes everything that made you forget."

For many years, I believed healing meant fixing something that was broken.

If I could just become more confident...

Less emotional...

More successful...

More positive...

Then perhaps life would finally feel different.

But the more I worked on myself, and the more women I had the privilege of working with, the more I realised something different.

Most women are simply carrying too much.

Too many expectations.

Too many old beliefs.

Too much guilt.

Too much pressure to be everything for everyone.

Healing is about gently letting go.

I'll never forget one woman who attended one of my workshops.

She arrived holding onto her sister because she struggled to walk without support.

She had visited several doctors.

Every test came back normal.

Every report said the same thing.

"There is nothing medically wrong."

Yet she couldn't walk steadily, afraid of falling down.

She also carried another fear.

She couldn't step into a lift unless someone was with her.

The fear felt completely real.

Over the two days we spent together, she began seeing herself differently...

Deep reflections.

A willingness to look inward and letting go of fears..

Something shifted inside her

At the end of those two days, she walked around the room on her own.

She danced.

She also smiled and said,

"I took the lift all by myself."

I still remember the joy on her face.

She had conquered a fear.

She had rediscovered something much more important.

Trust in herself.

I often think about that experience because..

Sometimes healing looks like saying no for the first time.

Sometimes it looks like sleeping peacefully.

Sometimes it looks like forgiving yourself.

Sometimes it looks like laughing again after years of simply surviving.

Healing is deeply personal.

It doesn't always change our circumstances overnight.

But it changes the way we go about our lives.

Over the years, I've noticed that every meaningful transformation follows a similar path.

It begins with awareness.

You begin to see the patterns you've been living.

Then comes acceptance.

Simply seeing yourself with compassion instead of criticism.

From there, healing becomes possible.

Old stories begin to fade away.

Old fears begin to disappear..

Love begins to replace fear.

When I eventually gave this journey a name, I called it The Art of Loving Method™.

because, to me, loving yourself is an art.

An art of becoming aware.

An art of accepting yourself.

An art of healing.

An art of returning to love.

Every woman experiences that journey differently.

There isn't a perfect order.

There isn't a finish line.

There is only one gentle invitation.

To keep coming back to yourself.

Again and again.

Perhaps that's what healing has always been.

Not becoming someone else.

But remembering the woman who was there before fear, guilt and self-doubt convinced her she wasn't enough.

Healing isn't about fixing yourself.

It's about remembering that you were never broken in the first place.

A Moment With Yourself

Before you read the final chapter, sit quietly with these questions:

- What am I ready to let go of?
- What part of myself am I ready to welcome home?

With love, always begin with yourself.

The Art of Loving Philosophy

I believe every woman is already whole.

She does not need fixing.

She needs to remember who she already is..

Awareness helps her see herself.

Acceptance helps her embrace herself.

Healing helps her release what no longer belongs to her.

Love helps her become who she has always been.

This is the Art of Loving Method..

Chapter 10

Coming Home to Yourself

"The greatest journey you will ever take is not towards success. It is the journey back to yourself."

If you've read this far, I'd like to begin by saying something simple.

Thank you.

Thank you for trusting me with your heart.

Perhaps, as you've turned these pages, you've recognised parts of yourself.

The woman who keeps giving until she has nothing left.

The woman who carries responsibilities without complaint.

The woman who quietly wonders why success hasn't brought the peace she thought it would.

The woman who has spent years trying to become enough.

If you've recognised yourself...

I hope you've also begun to see something else.

You were never the problem.

The patterns were.

The beliefs were.

The expectations were.

But you...

You have always been worthy.

One of the greatest lessons life has taught me is that healing isn't about becoming someone new.

It's about removing everything that convinced you that you had to become someone else.

For years, many of us have been chasing happiness as though it lives somewhere outside us.

In the next promotion.

The perfect relationship.

More money.

More recognition.

More achievements.

And while those things may bring joy, they can never replace the relationship we have with ourselves.

Because no matter where we go...

We take ourselves with us.

Perhaps that's why this journey matters so much.

Not because it changes who you are.

But because it changes how you see yourself.

When you begin to accept yourself...

You stop fighting yourself.

When you stop fighting yourself...

Life becomes lighter.

Not perfect.

Just easy.

You begin saying no without guilt.

Resting without apology.

Celebrating your own progress instead of comparing it with someone else's.

You no longer need everyone to understand your choices.

Because you understand them.

And that changes everything.

If there is one thing I hope you take away from this book, it is this:

Your worth has never depended on your achievements.

It has never depended on someone else's approval.

It has never depended on how perfectly you've lived your life.

Your worth has always been yours.

Nothing can add to it.

Nothing can take it away.

Maybe today is the day you stop trying to earn what has always belonged to you.

Maybe today is the day you stop introducing yourself through your roles...

...and start meeting the woman behind them.

Maybe today is the day you stop waiting for someone else to choose you...

...and choose yourself.

Not once.

Every day.

Because self-love isn't a destination.

It's a daily decision.

A decision to speak to yourself with kindness.

To honour your needs.

To trust your intuition.

To forgive yourself when you stumble.

To begin again whenever you need to.

And if you forget...

Because all of us do...

Simply come back.

Again.

And again.

There is no failure in returning to yourself.

Only love.

Perhaps that's why I called this book The Art of Loving Yourself.

Because love isn't something we master overnight.

It's something we practise.

Patiently.

Gently.

One choice at a time.

And one day, almost without noticing...

You realise you've stopped searching for yourself.

Because you've finally come home.

You don't become worthy by loving yourself.

You begin loving yourself because you've finally remembered that you always were.

A Moment With Yourself

Before you close this chapter, ask yourself:

- What is one old belief I choose to leave behind today?
- What is one loving promise I want to make to myself as I begin this next chapter of my life?

With love, always begin with yourself.

My dear friend,

Thank you for trusting me with your heart.

Perhaps we have never met.

Yet through these pages, I hope you've felt seen.

If there's one thing I hope you remember long after you've closed this book, it's this...

You have never needed to become more worthy.

You have always been worthy.

My wish for you is not just that life becomes easier.

My wish is that you become kinder to yourself.

That you trust your voice.

That you honour your needs.

That you stop apologising for being YOU..

And that every time life pulls you away from yourself, you remember the way home.

With love,

Ssireesha puduru

Before We Say Goodbye...

I don't believe our paths crossed by accident.

If this book found its way into your hands, perhaps it was because a part of you was ready.

Ready to stop surviving.

Ready to stop proving.

Ready to finally choose yourself.

My hope is that these pages have reminded you of something you may have forgotten for a long time:

You have always been enough.

This book may be coming to an end, but your journey is only just beginning.

And I would be honoured to continue walking beside you.

Let's Stay Connected

Every week, I share reflections, inspiration, and practical tools to help women deepen their journey of Awareness, Acceptance, Healing, and Love.

If these pages resonated with you, I'd love to connect with you beyond this book.

Instagram: ... https://www.instagram.com/lifecoach_sireesha.puduru/

Facebook: ... <https://www.facebook.com/sireeshapuduru1>

LinkedIn: ... <https://www.linkedin.com/in/sireeshapuduru-selfloveandabundance/>

YouTube: ... <https://www.youtube.com/@sireeshapuduru5533>

Website: ... www.sireeshapuduru.com

If You're Ready for a Deeper Transformation...

Sometimes a book is enough to create a shift.

Sometimes it's the beginning of something much bigger.

If you feel called to go deeper—to understand the patterns that have shaped your life, heal emotional wounds, and experience the Art of Loving Method™ personally—I invite you to book a complimentary Discovery Call with me.

It's simply a conversation.

A safe space to explore where you are, what may be holding you back, and whether working together feels like the right next step for your journey.

If it is, wonderful.

If it isn't, that's perfectly okay too.

Either way, I hope you leave our conversation feeling more heard, more hopeful, and more connected to yourself.

If you feel that this book has opened something within you, I'd love to meet you.

Book a complimentary discovery call

<https://calendly.com/sireeshapuduru/30min>

The Woman Behind The Art of Loving Method™

And this is my story..... My Journey Back to Myself

I often say my childhood was happy... and it truly was, in many ways.

I was the youngest of five siblings, pampered, protected, and loved. We lived in beautiful old British bungalows, had access to good schools, clubs, and a life that looked comfortable from the outside.

But life has a way of teaching you lessons quietly... not loudly.

With five children and a single earning parent, money was always limited. We shared everything. Clothes were stitched in bulk from the same fabric—so all of us wore identical dresses. Birthdays and festivals were among the few times we got something new.

And around me... life looked very different.

The children I grew up with came from affluent families—just one or two siblings, stylish clothes, polished shoes, movie outings, and a lifestyle that felt... out of reach.

I still remember those moments—standing there, looking at them, and feeling like I didn't belong.

Like I was the odd one out.

Like something about me was... less.

That's where it began.

Not loudly. Not dramatically.

Just a quiet, persistent feeling: "I am not good enough."

As a child, I didn't understand circumstances or financial realities.

I only knew how it felt.

And somewhere along the way, I made it mean something about me.

That feeling stayed.

It followed me into adulthood—into my choices, my confidence, and even my work.

I tried multiple businesses, each time starting with excitement and hope.

But somewhere along the way, that same old feeling would creep in—

"What's the point?"

"Who am I to do this?"

"This won't work anyway."

And slowly, I would lose interest... step back... and eventually stop.

At that time, I thought I was failing because of external reasons—timing, strategy, circumstances.

But looking back now, I can see clearly...

I wasn't failing outside.

I was stopping myself from within.

The truth is, a part of me believed that if I became successful, I would finally feel worthy.

That success would fix that deep-rooted feeling of "not enough."

But no amount of doing can heal a belief that was never addressed.

After multiple setbacks, I reached a point where I felt completely lost.

Tired of trying. Tired of starting over. Tired of not understanding what was going wrong.

That's when a close friend suggested I attend a workshop.

She simply said, "It might help you."

I didn't know what it was.

I didn't know what to expect.

But I was open... and honestly, a little desperate for answers.

That workshop—based on the teachings of Louise Hay—changed my life.

For the first time, I understood something profound:

My life was not happening to me... I was creating it through my thoughts and feelings.

Until then, I had been completely externally focused—blaming situations, people, circumstances.

But this shifted everything inward.

And then came the moment that truly transformed me.

During a mirror work exercise, I had a deep realization—
I had been there for everyone else... but never for myself.

I had cared, given, adjusted, supported...

But I had never paused to ask:

What do I need?

What do I feel?

What do I want?

Because I didn't even know that I mattered in that way.

That realization broke something open inside me.

I began practicing self-love—not as a concept, but as a daily choice.
And slowly, things started shifting.

I could say “no” without guilt.

I could prioritize myself without feeling selfish.

I began to feel... lighter. Clearer. More at peace.

And for the first time, I wasn't trying to prove anything to anyone.
I was simply becoming more me.

That's when I felt a deep calling—

If this work could change my life... It could change others' lives too.

And that's how my journey as a facilitator and coach began.

Today, through my work, I help people release the same emotional patterns I once carried—the feeling of not being enough, the need to prove, the fear of failure, the habit of abandoning oneself.

Because I know this truth deeply now:

You don't need to become more to feel worthy.

You need to heal what made you believe you weren't.

My Mission

My mission is to help women reconnect with themselves through Awareness, Acceptance, Healing and Love, so they can create lives filled with confidence, peace, abundance and joy.

WHY ?

Because I believe no woman should spend her life proving her worth.

The Art of Loving Method™

Helping women move from...

Burnout → Balance

People Pleasing → Healthy Boundaries

Self-Doubt → Self-Trust

Perfectionism → Self-Acceptance

Survival → Self-Love

The Art of Loving Philosophy

"Awareness helps you see yourself. Acceptance helps you embrace yourself.
Healing helps you free yourself. Love helps you come home to yourself."

